Emerging and Re-Emerging
Microbial Threats:
Challenges for the 21st Century

October 25-26, 2007

This year's CACDC Conference – Emerging and Re-Emerging Microbial Threats: Challenges for the 21st Century, focuses on many topics ripped from the headlines. Each of the topics to be discussed has a potential to heavily impact the health of the communities thus requiring prompt public health intervention.

Public Health continues to face many challenges in carrying out our daily mission of protecting the public's health. In the past year we have seen threats to our food supply, potential risk for transmission of drug resistant tuberculosis and many other communicable disease concerns that we must each handle daily.

We are pleased to have John Jereb, MD as our featured speaker. John is with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) and will provide very timely and important information on MDR and XDR tuberculosis and the recent airline situation.

Included in our discussion of food safety we will learn if Spinach is really as good for us as we thought. This presentation will include issues of interest to Public Health laboratories as well as Environmental Health and other units that work to protect the public's health.

Working with the press and utilizing their resources to get our message out has become an all important skill. Helpful guidelines for involving the press in helping us get our health messages out to the community will be discussed.

A new unit in the California Department of Public Health working with Hospitals on Infection Control has been established and will be presented along with our link to this very important program.

We look forward to seeing you at our Fifth Annual CACDC Conference.
